MORE INTEREST IN CHINA DEMANDED.

BY Y. T. PYUN.

The Chinese are a people Oriental to the core. Yet their ways of daily life bear a remarkable analogy to those of Occidental nations. In this point, the Chinese are unique. When carefully studied, their dressing, housing, and cooking will be found more akin to European ways than to those of their immediate neighbors. While sluggishness is a vice in others, it is rather a virtue in a Chinese, for you find in him as much persevering doggedness, which is twin-brother to the former characteristic. In fact, there is no denying that the Chinese cherishes a little too excessive love of money. But who can prove that it is no auspicious sign of the possibility of China's making herself the most practical nation in the world some day, since no practical nation is quite indifferent to money? On the contrary, the future of a nation containing many a son that revels on his last penny and faces his beggared morrow with complacence is rather to be despaired of.

Though the present political chaos in China presents a dark picture, it is however quite a thing, to be expected of a newborn republic after the overthrow of the long, traditional, autocratic policy of one of the oldest and most unwieldy nations. A democratic form of government has been suddenly introduced, but the people have never been trained to the principles and usages of democracy. Moreover old officials of rapine and violence are still left at the helm of government. Hence all the endless internal warfare and disorder. This condition of things can not be suffered to last long. We all sincerely hope that with the new year the saner elements in China will soon get the upper hand and be able to weld that disrupted ancient empire into a new whole. Our deep faith is that the Chinese, as a people, will outlive every difficulty in the path of their progress. They will outlive the present chaos of politics. They will even outlive Bolshevism. They will survive the threat of partition and prove that it is but a wild dream. Under a wreck of a government, the Chinese are nevertheless, on the whole, a settled, patient, industrious, law-abiding people. Only let them have time to solve their own problems. Indeed, if we do not look forward to a time when China will prove herself to be the mainstay of Asia, both politically and economically, strong with a new sense of unity and power, we shall see, at no distant future, that we have been poor judges.
